Sense of Site

Architect Tor Stuart's vision for tricky lots and landscapes yields stunning homes that fit right in.

In the realm of residential architecture, a home designed by ArchitecTor embraces the colors, textures, and views of the natural environment by integrating abundant indoor-outdoor living spaces and effectively creating an environment that lives much larger than the contained floor area.

In Harmony with Nature

For more than 25 years, Tor Stuart's body of work has balanced delicate detail and bold complexities inspired by the beauty of the land. Working in styles from contemporary to traditional, from modern to Pueblo, Stuart strives to design homes that form a union with their site, where visual delights await around every corner. Inspired by the natural textures and colors of the Sonoran Desert, he creates homes that fit harmoniously with the land.

Growing up in Norway, Stuart was fascinated by ancient Norwegian vegetative roof systems. That fascination evolved into a powerful belief in the importance of green architecture and sustainable design; ArchitecTor projects increasingly rely on sustainable features such as net-zero energy consumption and taking advantage of the natural light.

"Above all, I believe that a house can and should be a work of art you can live in—an enduring expression of each client's aesthetic," says Stuart. "It's all about creating a successful design relationship where we fuse their vision with our creativity."
